This study examined the effectiveness of the Self-Regulated Strategy Development (SRSD) model of writing instruction on the writing performance and acquisition of self-determination skills for middle school-age students with emotional and behavioral disorders (EBD). SRSD instruction was modified by incorporating instruction on self-determination skills during the lessons. A group experimental design was conducted in which 21 seventh-grade students with severe EBD were randomly assigned to either experimental or control groups. The intervention was conducted during 30-minute sessions, four times per week, for 33 days. Six special education teachers participated in the study.

Experimental teachers were trained on SRSD procedures and implemented the intervention with a high degree of fidelity.

Using the SRSD model, experimental groups were taught to plan and write persuasive essays and incorporate self-advocacy into their writing.

Students in the control condition received writing instruction with the established school writing curriculum, Write Traits (Spandel, 2002). Dependent
